When the Government awarded a contract to Whitney in 1798, the Charleville musket, model 1763, was used as a model. Whitney, however, was familiar with the 1777 Charleville model and considered its lock a better piece of mechanism. The Government officials relied on Whitney's mechanical genius, and permitted him to use on his muskets a lock with a flat face, oval-faced hammer and inclined brass pan (this improvement did not come into general use until 20 years later). When Whitney received another contract in 1808, he made muskets on the same design and marked them similarly, so that it is difficult, when a musket bears no other marks, to tell when he made it.

The bayonet is missing, otherwise the piece is complete and in very good original condition.
